History

When the Northern Realms rulers and militaries expressed a desire for invincible superhumans the Circle chose to try and satisfy their demands and create the next stage in human evolution. There were many theories as to how to do so. Some attempted to re-animate selected corpses made of modified human parts while others tried altering fetuses in their mother's wombs and others still took to experimenting on children.[1]

After years with nothing but failures, it would be Alzur, student of Cosimo Malaspina,[2] who would create a mutagen, anatoxin, hormone, and a virus. Rituals and formulas would be refined to make the decoction more effective, but before they could use them a sorcerer would steal all the project's material and flee to Mirabel.

The Circle would spread accusations that the mage was vying for world domination and, when the sorcerer would use a group of women called the Witches to give birth to the first witchers, they would hunt down all the Witches, almost wiping them out completely.

The sorcerer who stole the research would soon die under shadowy circumstances, potentially assassinated by the Circle, and his acolytes would become divided on how to continue his work with the witchers.[1]

Known members

- Alzur[2]
- Cosimo Malaspina[2]

Note

- According to Preston Holt they called themselves "the Circle" at the time of the witchers creation. Their modern name, if they still exist at all, is unknown.
